GENERALLY SPEAKING

Rachel Knight,
General Manager

A few months ago, I went on a weeklong meditation retreat. It was my first, and it was an interesting experience. In the weeks since, with the increased mindfulness gathered during my retreat, I've had another fascinating experience: watching my attention readjust to our chaotic world.

Of course, we're all aware that we're living in what Nobel Prize-winning economist Herbert Simon dubbed the "attention economy." Various entities are constantly vying for our attention to sell us whatever they have on offer. Despite my awareness of these tactics, I have still been struck by how often I notice an attempt to hijack my attention and draw me into mindless consumption.

Along with my heightened awareness of this business model that depends on seizing time and attention to ensure a mindful decision never occurs, I have noticed a renewed gratitude for the non-commercial spaces that public media creates and protects. Public media is based on public service, not on harvesting the attention of consumers, and our platforms and content reflect that. There are no hooks engineered to outrun our judgment, because success is measured by whether we are informed and served, not by how long we were held captive.

Thanks, as always, for investing in public media, and helping ensure a place where our attention is respected, mindful engagement is celebrated, and we can find content worth choosing.

Rachel Knight, General Manager
